Many researchers have found that family members are happier when they share household chores and responsibilities. However, sharing responsibilities doesn't necessarily mean family members must divide chores equally. Sharing can mean something different to every family, doing things together and having mutual, agreed-upon divisions of labor benefitted all family members. The more all family members perceived that they were engaged in routine family work tasks, the better the relationships were for all members. Doing household chores and being engaged with the children seem to be important ways for fathers to connect with their family, and that connection is related to better relationships. These simple connections in daily life seem to enhance family members' satisfaction and improve the quality of their relationships.
